The rise of African history as an academic discipline is characterized by an emphasis on local developments. From the example of Hausa historiography it can be seen that the dismissal of any important influence from the outside world, disregarding earlier proposals to this effect, has led research into a cul-de-sac. For more than two decades no significant attempts have been made to overcome these obvious chronological and conceptual shortcomings of the available reconstructions of Hausa history. At present we are therefore reduced to a number of confusing and mutually exclusive theories. The evidence of the following pages will show that placing Hausa society and history in the context of ancient Near Eastern history and culture opens up new perspectives for research.

2. Cult-Dramatic Re-Enactments of the Bayajidda Legend During the New Year Festivals of Hausaland

The most obvious link relating the Bayajidda narrative to Hausa tradition as a whole consists of its annual re-enactments during the festal ceremonies in the royal towns in Hausaland. However, as a result of the Fulani jihād at the beginning of the nineteenth century many institutions and other survivals from the pre-Islamic period were abolished. Only in the kingdoms which remained under Hausa domination have these traditions survived almost unchanged. This is particularly true for Daura, where the British colonial administration reinstated the original Hausa dynasty in 1906. It is also the case in Gobir, where the Hausa rulers were able to resist the Fulani jihād. In Zaria the Hausa ruling class was expelled but they founded the refugee kingdom of Abuja, the present Suleja further south. After their conquest of the Hausa kingdoms, the Fulani specifically abolished the royal offices given to women. Apparently they recognised that these offices were of decisive significance for the pre-Islamic heritage of the Hausa states.

The Gani festival of Daura as a whole consists of the systematic re-enactment of the Bayajidda legend. Today most of the participants of the festival content themselves with the idea that they are celebrating the fully Islamic mawilād or birthday of the Prophet Muhammad. Only a few insiders with historical interests are aware that the legend and the corresponding festival belong to an ancient Hausa tradition rooted in the pre-Islamic past. Superficial observers may think that the Gani festival takes place in the same way as the two other great Islamic festivals celebrated by processions on horseback, the ṣukur sallā (‘id al-kahib) and the karranar sallā (‘id al-seghir or ‘id al-fitr). In fact, the more complex and
People assemble here for the procession of the Gani festival without previous Friday prayer

Meeting place

Gani festival

Path of the king to the well - now abandoned (at midnight on the eve of the Gani festival)

Procession on the first day of the festival (hasan sallı)

Procession on the second day of the festival (hasan doushe)

Friday mosque

Northern gate

Placating of the snake and drawing of water (now abandoned)

First homage to the king

Second homage to the king

Palace

Mosque

House of Aysana

House of Magajiya

Kasuwa well

Kano

Map 2: The Gani festival of Daura

Ancient Kingdoms: Hausa States

Photo 1: The king of Daura

more original sallı].

What then are the functions of the sallı? As an incarnation of the triple woman, which is now obsolete, it is celebrated at midnight by four persons, often accompanied by Dakama singers. The purpose is to placate the snake and encourage fertility.

The second performance (sallı) in the afternoon of the festival, in which we find the king sitting on a throne, in the company of his dancers and attendants, occurs in front of his palace. The king is equipped with a large knife used by his ancients. They celebrated in a royal occasion, and it is in this context that the king is celebrated as the night of fertility.
more original sallar Gani provided the original model for the other two more islamized festivals.

What then are the most important features of the Gani festival? Above all it has to be noted that the king acts on the three outstanding days of the festival as an incarnation of Bayajidda, his legendary ancestor. The first performance, which is now obsolete, was very secret. It was enacted on the eve of the festival at midnight by four persons: the king himself, his close advisor Shamaki and two Dakama singers.22 The king then went to the well of Kusugu, listened to the song placating the snake and drew holy water from the well.

The second performance is staged in the form of a great procession (hauwan sallal) in the afternoon of the first day of the festival, leading from a place north of the town to the western gate and then to the palace. At the centre of the parade we find the king sitting on horseback holding in his hands the sword and the knife used by his ancestor to kill the snake and to cut off its head. Close to the king are, as the night before, Shamaki and the Dakama singers. All participants in the festivities rejoice on this day; but only the insiders realize that they are celebrating the killing of the snake.

22 On the functions and social background of these officials see Smith, Dauna, 42, 137, 315.

The third performance takes place on the second day and consists again of a great parade (kawan dausha). But this time the cortège of horse riders and men on foot starts from the palace and leads to the house of the Magajiya. In commemoration of the preliminary rule of the Queen Magajiya Daurama and her subsequent marriage to the dragon-killer, the king stops at the house of the present Magajiya, enters and greets her. Next, the cavalcade moves on, passes by the house of Ayana — the old woman who once received the hero during the night and advised him on how to approach the well — crosses the former southern gate of the town and turns back by the next gate to the palace.

Both processions are patterned on the legend of Daura, the first representing the triumphal entry of the hero into Magajiya's palace and the second his subsequent marriage to the queen. In spite of the Islamic overlay of the celebrations, it is not difficult to recognise that the main ceremonies correspond to an ancient cult-drama constituting a New Year festival.

A major question with respect to the Gani festival of Daura concerns the incarnation of Bagwariya. There are a number of arguments in favour of the Iya. She is officially regarded as the king's sister and she presides over the ritual washings, seclusion and instruction of every prince on his first marriage. She is further in charge of selecting the three major non-Islamic — probably Ažna — titles: Magajiya Bayamadi, Sarkin Masu and Dan Baroka. Particularly significant is her connection with Magajiya Bayamadi since he is considered the descendant and the incarnation of Karbagari. During the major festivals the king visited the Iya on his way to the prayer ground outside the town for a "private audience." According to another author, during this visit the Iya produced two strips of woven white cloth and presented it with the words "here is the milk." Earlier this "private audience" was probably seen as a re-enactment of Bayajidda's relationship with Bagwariya. In Gobir the Iya or Inna is likewise considered to be the "sister" of the king and, as we shall see, the festal cult-drama insinuates that the two have intimate relations. In Boru, it is Bayajidda of Daura, while another second female official has the same function. During the rituals of consecration of the Ngalaga (Duguwa), this choice and the subsequent secret ceremony of the girl received the title and again only in conformity to Islam has the Luwa of Musun in the Gani festival.

Similar processions are observed in the other royal towns, with the procession of the first moving north of the town, then the others from the west heading towards the east. People start from the west and march to the southeast to the heights, where they return to the palace. On both occasions, the Dodo "the great Dodo" is present, the king and the warrior god of Gani. When a distant drum is heard, burnous the king is summoned likely his warriors use this to inform the killing of Dodo by the Dodo, who is the worship.

Certain pre-Islamic practices are available for Zaria: the mawlid, the visits of the holy men of Sanga and the Iya office that is the same as the Bori. This is the Iya office that corresponds to the Iya office in Boru, which is the same as the Bori office in Boru.

23 Frankfort, Kingship, 313-333; de Moor, New Year, I, 4-29.
24 Smith, Daura, 133; FN 97, 16-22.
25 Smith, Daura, 35, 39, 93, 123-124. This information places the meeting between the king and the Iya on the first day of the Gani festival before the great procession (jauwa ya'adi). It supports the validity of those versions of the Bori legend which claim that Bori, a brother of the hero from Bornu and that she was pregnant when she arrived in Daura (Palmer, Memoirs, III, 133). Alhasan mentions that Bayajidda came with a slave (FN 95, 81).
26 Palmer, Memoirs, III, 145. Because of its pre-Islamic implications, the Iya office is now purely honorific.

28 By indicating that the legend suggests that the hero office in Bornu see Platt, Borno, 162; Palmer, Memoirs, II, 63.
29 In Dikwa, this correspondence is established in Frauen, 183, 186-192.
30 Both processions follow the Garba, Abu Bakr Sh mate relations. In Bornu the Magira performed similar functions as the Magajiya of Daura, while another female official corresponded to the Bagwariya. The second female official held in the Kanuri kingdom of Musune the title of Luwa. During the rituals of coronation the king chose a mate from among the girls of the Ngala (Dugua) clan with whom he spent seven days of seclusion. By this choice and the subsequent concubinage during the period of seclusion, the girl received the title and position of Luwa. Recent attempts to reach greater conformity to Islam have most likely contributed to obscuring the role of the Luwa of Musune in the installation ceremonies and of the Iya of Daura in the Gani festival.

Similar processions based on a common cult-mythological pattern take place in the other royal towns of Hausaland during the great Islamic festivals. In Zaria the procession of the first day (hawan salât) starts likewise from the prayer ground north of the town, then it moves outside the town to the northwest and enters from the west heading east to the palace. On the third day (hawan dâsu) the people start from the palace and turn south – in pre-Pulani times probably to the southeast to the house of Magajiya – and cross the southern gate. After a short while they return by the same gate but they then join the main road to the palace. On both occasions the cavalcade passes by the square called Bâkkan Dodo “the great Dodo” at a distance of one kilometer from the palace. Here the king and the warrior groups from the head of the cortège stop for a few minutes. When a distant drum is sounded they continue. Hidden under the hood of his burnous the king is supposed to be invisible until he reaches the palace. Most likely his warriors used to perform mock fights at this spot thus re-enacting the killing of Dodo by the mythical hero.

Certain pre-Islamic practices are better preserved in Abuja/Sulje than in Zaria. With respect to the royal festivals some details supplement the information available for Zaria: the existence of a Gani festival corresponding to the Islamic mawlid, the visits of the king to a male and two female officials, the Turaki, the Sanaaniya and the Iya (who each have their own royal household with titleholders corresponding to those of the king), a special song making it clear that Gani 27 Kühne, Königum, 82-88; 123-124; Nicolas, Dynamique, 340-342; 389.

28 By indicating that the hero married Magira in Bornu, most versions of the Bayajidda legend suggest the parallel position of Magira and Magajiya (cf. Arnett, “Hausa chronicle”, 162; Palmer, Memoirs, III, 133; Salifou, Damogarum, 233; Smith, Daura, 54). For the female offices in Bornu see Plate, Frauen, 163-242.
29 In Dikwa, this corresponds to the title of Tauda and in Ndufu to that of Zamzam (Plate, Frauen, 183, 186-192).
30 Both processions follow a similar route as those of Daura (see above map 2 p. 222).
31 Garba, Abu Bakr Shantali, Saddiq FN 00, 1, 28-32.
is a New Year festival, and the custom of finishing the festival after twenty days by dancing to the end of the town with two branches of a certain tree and then throwing the branches over the town wall. Further, it is noteworthy that the king on the eve of the Gani festival goes by foot to the house of the Turaki where he sits down with his host between two lampstands each holding twelve receptacles for oil. The next day he greets, one after the other, the two women officials by the respectful address "mā" signifying "mama, mother" before entering with his officials into their house and dancing with them. All these elements point to the now largely forgotten former cultic significance of the Gani festival of Abuja/Zaria. The night vigil can be associated with the killing of the dragon, the honorific "mother" with a title given to a priestess, and the dancing with a sacred marriage. Therefore these features appear to belong to the cult-dramatic underpinning of the myth lying behind the Bayajidda legend.

In Gobir the Canaanite cult-mythological pattern of the New Year festival is re-enacted quite differently. On one of the days preceding the festival, the Sarkin Annā, the "king of the Annā people", goes to see the king in his palace. He brings with him a golden and a silver bangle and also a ram. The meeting between him and the king consists of a ritual combat: he puts the golden bangle on the right arm of the king and keeps the silver one for himself, then both pretend to engage in a short fight; finally Sarkin Annā removes the silver bangle and places it on the left arm of the king. After that both protagonists caress the ram from its tail to its head. The ram, handed over by the first official to the second, symbolically represents the primordial being of which Sarkin Annā is the descendant and living representative. The ritual combat fight in turn can be interpreted as a symbolic confrontation between the forces of the moon and those of the sun. Indeed, since Sarkin Annā represents Karbāgari/Ishmael and the king Bawo/Isaac-Jacob, the antagonism refers not only back to the distinction between the Annā and the Hausā clans but also to the ancestral division between the Hausa and Bambá states and thus to the difference between the Israelites and the Arabs. Beyond the legendary level, the ritual combat between incarnations of the sun and the moon also has vast mythological implications: apparently the forces behind Bawo/Isaac-Jacob were the deities of the upperworld, while those behind Karbāgari/Ishmael were the deities of the netherworld. Hence, it may be supposed that the biblical dichotomy between the astral dualism on Earth, with prevalent upperworld aspects, and the legendary aspect of the moon, i.e. the new moon, is very close to the Manakar "king of the black drums of the kingdom" cycle of cult-dramatic performance with its splitting up of the forces that incarnates as in Dauru stands apparently for an integration of the gods of Ugarit, the god of heaven and the god of the moon, Baal the powerful weapon, which in Babylon was carried in the cult drama of the New Year's fire by the smith in Gobir in order to bring life out of chaos.

On the following day a festival such an original way that no one can possibly have been able to forget. After the communal prayer goods are presented to the king stays in the midst of the crowd built for the occasion. After some dervishes have been crowned ceremony. Whisking the congregation turns to joyful laughter.

32 In Feske/Kebbi, Turaki is the name of the hut of Dango used at the festival of wanišan bakwai (Sheku, Mai Bori FN 95 130).
33 Tanko Turaki, Bisalla Sata FN 97, 78–82. See also Hassan/Shuaiba, Chronicle, 65–66, 68.
34 Nicolas, "Fondements", 223; id., Dynamique, 362; id., Question, 13; Kühme, Königturn, 79, 93.
36 For the importance of 18-24; Höfner, "Stammes- und Reichsdeute - thus bringing to the attention of the reader (151–225).
37 Nicolas, Dynamique, Kühme, Königturn, 187–188.
38 For the seven or twelve gods, Dynamique, 63, 227, 347, 61–68; Kühme, Königturn, 194–199.
The festival after twenty days of a certain tree and then it is noteworthy that the king stands at the base of the Turaki where he is holding twelve receptacles of wine, the two women officials "nearer" before entering with him. All these elements point to the presence of the Gani festival of the killing of the dragon, the version and the dancing with a sacred chain to the cult-dramatic underpinning.

The beginning of the New Year festival is marking the festival, the Sarkin Malnor-sking in his palace. He brings The meeting between him and the golden bangle on the right hand and both pretend to engage the bangle and places it on the ram. Then the ram from its tail to the second, symbolically unveiled is the descendant and living hut can be interpreted as a symbol of the descendant of the sun. Indeed, the king Bawo/Isaac-Jacob, the king of the Hausa and the Arab.\(^\text{35}\) Because the sun is an incarnation of the sun and the sun is the descendant of the forces behind the snake and those behind Karbagari/ Almah.\(^\text{36}\) It may be supposed that the bangle is also used at the festival of wassan Shuaib, Chronicle, 65-66, Question, 13; Kühme, Königsm, biblical dichotomy between the sons of Jacob/Israel and those of Ishmael is based on the astral dualism of the Semitic pantheon distinguishing between societies with prevalent upperworld and netherworld deities. Descent from Jacob is therefore the legendary aspect of the prevalence of the sun, i.e. the upperworld deities, in Israel and descent from Ishmael the legendary aspect of the prominent position of the moon, i.e. the netherworld deities, among the pre-Islamic Arabs.\(^\text{36}\)

On the eve of the festival, the king of Gobir walks to the house of Sarkin Malnor, "king of the blacksmiths" and strikes twelve times upon one of the twelve drums of the kingdom.\(^\text{37}\) As a descendant of Bayajidda he apparently begins a cycle of cult-dramatic performances commemorating the killing of the primordial snake and its splitting up into twelve parts.\(^\text{38}\) On the cult-mythological level he incarnates – as in Daura – the god of creation, while the chief of the blacksmiths stands apparently for an allied god of handicraft. According to the Baal Cycle of Ugarit, the god of handicraft Kothar-wa-Khasis forged for the god of creation Baal the powerful weapons used by the latter to kill the primordial deity Yamm, which in Babylon was called Tiamat.\(^\text{39}\) The comparison suggests that, acting out the cult drama of the New Year festival, the Baal-like king meets the chief blacksmith in Gobir in order to prepare himself for his subsequent fight with primeval chaos.

On the following day, the people of Gobir celebrate the sacrifice of the ram in such an original way that only minor elements of the cult-dramatic performance can possibly have been borrowed from Islam. The main ceremony takes place on the communal prayer ground at the southeast of the town. During the prayers the king stays in the middle of the congregation in an enclosed temporary shelter built for the occasion. After the prayers the donated ram is slaughtered in front of the assembly. Then the king himself changes his ordinary dress for those of his crowning ceremony. When he comes out of his shelter the sober mood of the congregation turns to joyfulness and jubilation.\(^\text{40}\) For the interpretation of this scene \(^{36}\) For the importance of the moon deity among the pre-Islamic Arabs see Fahd, Pantheon, 18-24; Höffter, "Stammesgruppen", 467, 492-494, 549. Day distinguishes between astral deities – thus bringing the sun and the moon together – and underworld deities (Yahweh, 151-225).

\(^{37}\) Nicolas, Dynamique, 363; Boyd, "Sallah in Gobir", 593-594; Lange FN 01, 51-52; Kühme, Königsm, 187-188.

\(^{38}\) Nicolas, Dynamique, 363; Boyd, "Sallah in Gobir", 593-594; Lange FN 01, 51-52; Kühme, Königsm, 187-188.

\(^{39}\) For the three or twelve heads remaining from the snake killed by Bayajiddu see Nicolas, Dynamique, 63, 227, 347, and Krieger, Geschicht, 19.

\(^{40}\) KU 1.2 IV 11-24, VI 50-53; Wyatt, Religious Texts, 65-67, 144-145; Pritchard, Texts, 61-68; Kühme, Königsm, 188-189.

\(^{40}\) Nicolas, Dynamique, 363-365; Boyd, "Sallah in Gobir", 594; Lange, FN 01, 53-54; Kühme, Königsm, 194-197.
it has to be remembered that the ram was provided by Sarkin Annâ and that both Sarkin Annâ and the king consecrated it for sacrifice. Just as Sarkin Ma‘era forges the weapons, Sarkin Annâ provides an animal symbolising his own deity for the creation combat. On the cult-mythological level the sacrifice of the ram parallels Marduk’s killing of Tiamat, which was likewise re-enacted in the Babylonian New Year festival.\(^{41}\) But while, according to the Babylonian creation epos Enûma elis, the splitting of her body gave rise to heaven and earth and the dissection of the various portions of her corpse to clouds, rivers, springs and mountains, the cutting-up of the ram only provides blessings to the believers without further explanations. Apparently up to the present day the people of Gobir perform a cult-dramatic creation combat of which the Muslims, by just slaughtering a ram or a camel during the pilgrimage of Mecca, preserve only the final act.\(^{42}\) On the basis of the biblical Isaac story (Gen 22: 2-14) and the parallel iwe sacrifice during the Itapa festival of Ife\(^{43}\) — where the high priest of Obameri/Môt consecrates the victim immolated by the high priest of Oba/a/la in the netherworld grove of Oba/a/la\(^{44}\) — it can be assumed that earlier the sacrificial animal was a human being. By merging their own traditions with the injunctions of Islam, the Gobirawa perpetuate the original cultic context out of which the main ritual of Islam drew its prime inspiration.

Subsequently the procession moves around the town by the east and the north, enters it from the north and reaches the palace from the west. During the king’s absence the Priestess Inna and her followers from the Bori cult take possession of the palace. When the king returns to the central place of the town, several ceremonies are performed there before he enters the palace.\(^{45}\) Then the Inna arrives with her Bori followers and does homage to the king before sitting down in the front room. The officials pass by her and homage to her before they do the same to the king. Next the king retires to his harem with his wives. After some time he comes back to the throne hall, receiving again the homage of his people. Subsequently the Inna and her lady followers come and in successive small groups join the newly withdrawn king.\(^{46}\) At this point the cultic performance of the sacred marriage becomes realistic: the king having first been alone with his wives, later stays with the high priestess Inna and her followers. Certain characteristics of the Inna of Gobir should be noted in order to understand the mythological

---

43 Cf. Stevens, “Orisha-nlá”, 193-197; FN 00, 93-95 (own observations).
44 It should be noted that in Ife and in Gobir the victim is handed over by the cult party of the netherworld to the cult party of the upperworld.
significance of her cult-dramatic behaviour: she represents Takurabow or Inā Bâkâ “the Black Inna”, the dynastic goddess of Gobir, she often wears male dresses and she is considered to be the sister and consort of the king.\(^\text{47}\) Although nothing precise is known about the earthly incarnation of Anat, similar features are known to have characterized the consort of Baal.\(^\text{48}\) In the absence of the Baal-like king, the Inna is the one who reigns over the country. When the king comes back from the chaos combat, the incarnated goddess offers herself in a sacred marriage to the victorious hero, thus ensuring the deification of her partner.

Apparentlly the cult-drama of Gobir refers to cult-mythological features similar to those lying behind the ancient Near Eastern New Year festival: the hero leaves his palace and enters into the netherworld, he arms himself with special weapons, kills the chaos monster, is resurrected from the netherworld and celebrates a sacred marriage. Like the divine kings of the ancient Near East, the king of Gobir thus ensured the annual renewal of his deification. The perpetuation of this Semitic cult-mythological pattern is not restricted to Africa. It can likewise be detected in the mythology that gave rise to the Christian celebrations of Easter and in the cult-dramatic performances of the Muslims during the pilgrimage at Mecca.\(^\text{49}\) In one way or another all these festivities are derived from the concept of a violent act of creation. This act had to be repeated year after year in order to guarantee not only the rule of particular divine kings, but also in order to ensure the continuity of the cosmic order.

3. The Social Dimensions of the Bayajidda Legend

Another important aspect of the Bayajidda legend concerns the classification of the major Central Sudanic societies into the categories of “Hausa” and “Banzâ.” The legend explains that the founders of the Hausa states and the Banzâ baƙwaƙa “seven Hausa” states descend from the sons of the two wives of the hero: the younger founder of the Hausa states from the Queen of Daura and the elder founder of the Banzâ states from the queen's female slave, given to the hero as a concubine.

It is often supposed that linguistic criteria distinguish the Hausa from the Banzâ states, the former being composed of Hausa-speakers and the latter of non-Hausa speakers.\(^\text{50}\) Two arguments undermine this linguistic explanation.

